This tutorial will show you how to create a simple image hover effect that displays an image and then when you hover your mouse over it a dynamic area appears, within which are additional images and text. This tutorial will show you how to create a simple image hover effect that displays an image and then when you hover your mouse over it a dynamic area appears, within which are additional images and text. In this example code we start with the basic XML- and image-based styles from the previous code, and then we'll add a bit of CSS to further style the box. The biggest change is our implementation of the :hover pseudo class (aka stylin' it up). Rather than repeatedly add our own clickable areas, we'll instead use the :hover pseudo class to set a fixed area underneath our element, and then add any additional.area H2s and/or.clickable classes we want to have styles for. There are two primary concepts at play: :hover and absolute positioning. 1) Hover :hover overrides the styling applied to our :active property to allow us to style the element that's currently in focus. For example, our color change will only happen when a user hovers over a color element, while a border change will only occur when the
